the Great Gatsby in Jazz Age

The Great Gatsby is closely tied to the Jazz Age, a decade marked by wealth, pleasure, and loose morals. It's clear that the novel presents the setting of 1920s and goes further by interpreting its values through image and atmosphere.

Gatsby's parties, which offer the clearest instance, display terrible wealth, as well as a culture built on attraction without real connection. Nick describes how "men and girls came and went like moths". People are drawn in by light and movement yet remain detached. In this way, the parties reflect a culture driven by excitement, which is meaningless and dull, feeling empty during energy.

The freedom of the Jazz Age isn't presented as release, but as a condition shaped by looser moral values. The 1920s, shaped by jazz and Prohibition, encouraged pleasure even when it broke social rules. Fitzgerald describes this world not only as fast or careless, but also shows how its energy depends on weakening moral limits. Social life is fluid, relationships shallow. Freedom is the erased moral, where movement replaces commitment.

Through symbols, the novel shows that class division persists beneath the surface. East Egg and West Egg mark location and represent two social systems. Gatsby's wealth allows him to approach that world, but not to enter it. His position reveals that money can create appearance without legitimacy. Rather than showing an open society, Fitzgerald suggests that the Jazz Age preserves older hierarchies under a modern surface.

To sum up, aspiration fails and falls into illusion rather than fulfillment, which is pathetic about Gatsby's dream. In the end, the green light draws these elements together. It represents hope with the very distance that is always seen, nevertheless, never reached. It's not simply personal failure, but a loss shaped by the society around him. A culture built on speed and desire turns aspiration into illusion. Fitzgerald thus links the energy of the decade to its emptiness, showing how the promise of the American Dream fades within the very moment it seems closest.
